A walrus brings his lady fair, a bouquet of fish, which she devours before they go off on a delightful skating party. At the same time a school of fish are taking their daily diving practice, in and out again untiringly. The penguins, out for a constitutional, come wandering along with Ducky as their leader, and Mamma Bear and her babes are shooting the shoots. Such glee and hilarity as they go up and then suddenly down the hill. But Henry Cat and Farmer Alfalfa are full of business. Henry is busy throwing into the farmer's boat provisions for a great hunt. When ready, off they sail, smoothly at first, then hitting ice, backing up, and then on again over the ice, until they reach their destination. But the walrus', having poked their heads through the ice, see them first and tap Farmer Al in the back when he is sounding the ice. Alfalfa finally spears a walrus, who is so enraged at his capture, that he starts out on a run, both hunters behind him. Henry riding on the farmer's back is snapped off and left behind when the others go through the entrance to a cave. Once, within, Al and the walrus take turns in ducking each other in the icy water holes (not playfully either). Two small bears playing leap-frog, have seen the chase and have gotten all the bears and follow on their bikes. They return home with one bicycle riderless, because Henry Cat has pounced on one of their numbers and run off with him. When Mamma Bear hears the tale, they start off again in pursuit of Henry and the Cub. Henry on seeing them, quickens his pace and soon comes upon Al Falfa fishing from a snow bank. Henry hands him the cub saying, "Hold him, I'll be back in a minute!" and vanishes. Poor unsuspecting Al, in the flash of an eye, Mamma Bear came upon him and off they rolled into an ice hole. In the turmoil the cub got away, but Henry came out of hiding and captured him again. The chase starts anew. Henry and the cub, Mamma and the little bears and all of the seals and walruses they passed on the way. Wise old Henry Cat had an idea. Onto the boat he leads, down the hatchway followed by all.

After shutting off all means of escape, he jumps into the canoe and off he sails with his booty. Very much frightened, the farmer comes out of the hole and looks around only to see how victorious the cat has been. He dives overboard and tries to catch up with the loaded vessel. Downhearted and vexed with himself he realizes that "Fortune favors the brave."
